Introduction

The term "legal writing" is generally used to mean all forms of writing written by lawmakers, judges, lawyers and jurists. This includes, but is not limited to, constitutions, laws, regulations, administrative decisions, contracts, instruments and wills, as well as forms of lawsuits, memoranda and judicial submissions to courts and others. All forms of legal writing can be reverted to two main types: legal analysis and legal drafting. This program deals with the both aspects to cover the formulation of administrative decisions as well as memoranda. The jurist must have some general characteristics when he begins to write legal memoranda, in order to be meaningful. Otherwise, the legal memorandum can be fraught with weakness and gaps that can lead to unsatisfactory results. He must have a sense of law, means his ability to conclude many of the points and that through the study of the merits and facts of the subject in consideration and neutrality. The legal sense also depends on the extent of the full background of the writer of the memorandum through the laws and regulations in the field of residence issued by the specialized authorities. The writer must have the ability to summarize the results concluded and organized according to the sequence of events or proceedings and thus allows the judge to consider the subject and view the memorandum in easy and simple way, the skills of writing legal memoranda and correspondences are numerous and of great importance in the field of law.
